A parent's guide for discussing adoption with adopted youth

Adoptees and professionals stress the importance of discussing adoption early and often with youth.

It's an ongoing discussion that should occur throughout a youth's lifetime instead of a one-time, sit-down talk at a certain age. It is beneficial in many ways – including physical, emotional and mental health – for youth to have a good understanding of their adoption, so don't wait for them to ask. If they have questions, answer them honestly and appropriately.

The voice of adoptees

For families, adoption is a positive and exciting time filled with hope and joy. For adoptees, it is not always the case, especially as they get older and process their adoption at a deeper level.

They may feel a great loss associated with their adoption and may wonder who they resemble, whose personality and temperament they have, why their biological family couldn't raise them and whether termination of parental rights was somehow their fault. They may think and worry about their biological relatives even if they have never met them.

That's why it is important for adoptive parents to let their children know they are always there to answer their questions in an open, non-judgmental, non-reactive and honest way. Adoptive parents do have resources to help in books written by adoptees, online support groups such as "I Am Adopted" on Facebook as well as MARE's Match Support Program.

Be cautious about sharing their stories

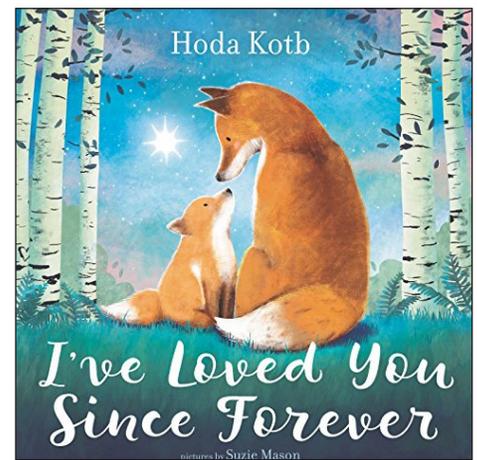

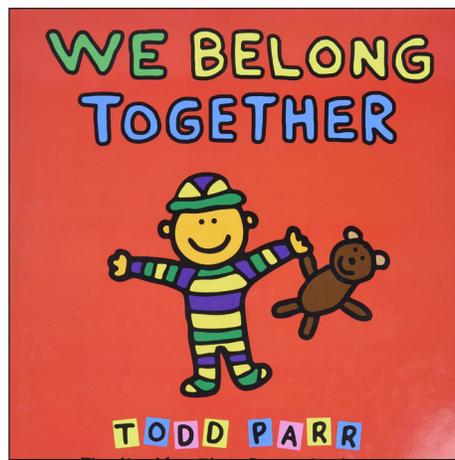

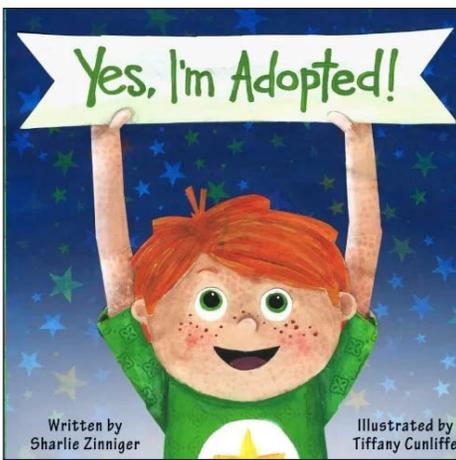

Let youth know you'll protect their privacy, and guide them about when to share their personal information and to whom. Understand that it is their story to share or keep confidential, not yours. Sharing pictures, updates, celebrations and more should be carefully considered with the youth's input.

Positive adoption language

Be aware that adoption language has evolved over the years with the guidance of adoptees and professionals to reflect a more positive, person-first experience instead of the process-focused approach years ago. Instead of a youth "put up" or "given up" for adoption, the current language involves adoption plans made for the youth or the youth being placed for adoption. Avoid terms such as “real mom” and “real dad” and instead refer to “birth mother” and “birth father.”

Family connections

It is a common fear of adoptive parents that their youth will want to seek information and potentially even meet their birth family someday. While this is a valid concern, some level of contact may be appropriate. Sometimes relationships with birth relatives can help youth understand and feel connected to their past, and it can even provide a positive support for them. If these connections aren't possible, pictures and life books can also help. Finally, as their youth become adults, adoptive parents need to consider when and how they may help provide information and aid in their youth's quest for biological family connections. Again take the time to be honest and forthright with your youth, and be aware that help and guidance are available from groups such as the Post Adoption Resource Center.

He's big Ray of sunshine every day

One of the people close to him describes Raymond as "brutally honest. He tells it like it is without hesitation."

Deep down, Raymond is just a softy at heart. He has a good sense of humor, he takes pride in being nice, and when asked to describe himself, Raymond says, "I am fun and a good kid."

He's a pretty normal kid who likes playing with Legos and everything to do with Batman. On his list of favorite things, Raymond includes wolves, ice cream and cake and the colors silver and gold.

Raymond also enjoys watching movies and sports and playing video games. He says his favorite holidays are those involving presents and candy, and his dream destination is France.

This honest young man wants an honest chance at a forever family. Raymond looks forward to traveling, being active and going out to eat with them.

"Raymond is determined to be adopted," says a person close to him. "He is adventurous and is willing to try new things. Raymond is loving towards his brothers and desires to have a lifelong relationship with them. Raymond is very well-loved."

Fun-loving families will love Areonna

Areonna's fun-loving ways would make her a great match for any forever family.

She enjoys drawing and writing, and she's working on writing a book. Areonna loves doing arts and crafts, reading, doing puzzles and watching movies. Areonna enjoys engaging in imaginative play.

This laidback girl says that if she could visit anywhere, she'd "go wherever God takes me." Perhaps it'll be the stage because Areonna loves singing and wants to become a singer or actress when she gets older.

Areonna's other favorite things include pink for color, piglet for animal and macaroni and cheese for food. Areonna has a knack for comforting others, and she would love to help the homeless. "She likes to make others happy," says a person who knows her.

When she's asked what she's most proud of, Areonna says, "People who believe in themselves." When she's asked what she wants to do with a forever family, Areonna says she wants to go to church with them, play with their children if they have them and – true to her comforting ways – be a support for the family. Areonna is described as a fun, upbeat young lady who likes to laugh. The most important thing Areonna wants others to know about her is, "I believe in the impossible, and I like taking care of others."
